ТВОРЧЕСКОЕ ЗАДАНИЕ

As of this century, some scientists are prone to the belief in different intelligent life forms outside of our planet. This theory encourages various topics for discussion.

One of the main concerns about this matter is linked to engagement with the other planets. If such species are found, do we, as a nation, need to contact them? I believe that should be done to an extent which doesn't endanger our existence. Since nobody actually knows what those life forms are capable of, this is a delicate matter. For example, it is almost clear that they don't speak any of our languages, they have different skills and minds. That being said, in my opinion, the only possible way of communication could be to send them our location and wait for an alien visit. But then again, is our planet ready for something like that? Another way to make contact could be sending a camera or a robot to explore their habitats and communicate distantly. The brightest of scientists and engineers ought to come up with an invention that would allow safe communication.

To conclude, I think engagement with outerly species has to be done as safely for mankind as possible. Exploration is the first step in communication with other planets.
