Food waste is a problem that has become global in the recent years. In the past such thing as throwing ~~away~~ food away basically meant wasting essential resources. Nowadays the amount of food items that are produced daily has never been higher, which means that store shelves are ~~filled with~~ full of all types of delicious goods. Sadly, most of them are thrown away either by the stores or the consumers.

The reasons why food is wasted can range from it simply going bad to the fact that we don't want it anymore. Since food isn't as scarce as it was in the last centuries, we don't think twice before wasting it.

The wasted food ends up on landfill sites, but it can be changed. To reduce the amount of food wasted we need to start from changing ourselves. We should stop buying food that, most likely, will not be eaten. Moreover, if the food on store shelves ^{and in restaurants} is about to go bad, instead of throwing it away, the stores can donate it to homeless people, who can't pay for their meals.

In conclusion, there is a possibility to cut down on food waste. But just as with any other global problem it requires the whole world to come together to solve it.
