ВАРИАНТ № 1

Food shortages are a global problem affecting millions of people, especially those in less developed countries. The cause of world hunger is up for debate, with corporations covering up their obvious involvement to avoid taking responsibility in an attempt to save face.

The obvious contributing factor is the wastefulness of the modern culture. Supermarkets throw out perfectly good produce due to it not passing their ridiculous visual expectations, despite being safe to eat, and then actively prevent any attempts at reusing said produce. If these products⁹³ even made it to the shelf, as much as 20% of all food waste in the world would be managed.¹⁰⁴

Another contributing factor is the wastefulness of fast-food chains. Establishments such as "Dunkin'" are known to throw out any unsold pastry, despite it being safe to eat, when it could have been given away to those in need.¹³⁴

These problems could easily be solved by introducing heavy fines to these ~~companies~~ companies for discarding of any food that would still be deemed safe to eat, while encouraging reusing such produce for charitable causes with governmental subsidies.¹⁴⁰

In conclusion, companies and manufacturers should be forcibly held accountable for their food waste practices. Global hunger is a worldwide problem, killing ~~tho~~ thousands of people each year. If we don't take action, this number will increase.
