World hunger is one of humanity's biggest problems. Oftentimes, it's caused by natural conditions and the location of an area suffering from it. For example, few plants grow in hot, dry regions, which is why many African and Middle Eastern countries frequently suffer from a lack of food. Sometimes, famines are caused by various disasters - blights, illnesses affecting cattle, swarms of locusts and other insects destroying fields.

Regardless of what the cause of hunger is, something needs to be done about it. So, what can we do?

First of all, we can reduce the amount of food waste we leave behind. By buying only the groceries we need, we can ensure that the extra food will be sold to other countries, to folks who need it more. Second of all, we can donate to charities trying to combat world hunger and provide resources to those in need. While not everyone has the money to make such donations, if you do, donating it is a great way to help a good cause. Third of all, we can spread awareness, tell others about the causes of world hunger and which areas of the world are affected by it, so that other people can join the fight against world hunger.
