The problem of equal food distribution is becoming more and more talked about. Whereas some countries are trying to understand where to find a place for their food remnants, others would be happy to have those remnants for breakfast.

The reasons for this disappointing situation are clear. The fast-developing countries try to produce and sell more food items. Such motives lead to full shelves in many shops, on which products stay for so long and go bad. In contrast, less developed countries do not even have factories or those who would like to build them or relish growing their produce. Moreover, the government are not always willing to ameliorate, I would call it, fatigue of their ~~people~~ citizens or help other countries with the issue of that kind.

I firmly believe, there are some ways of combating the problem. Firstly, prosperous countries should decrease their food production for some time. Secondly, it is imperative to act now and build factories and markets in poorer countries to motivate people to ~~make their own food~~ feed themselves.

To conclude, I hope there is a chance of establishing an equitable system of food distribution in every part of the world. Individuals need to cooperate with their government to achieve an adequate amount of food for everyone.
