It goes without saying that people tend to waste more and more food nowadays. Victims of consumerism have started to buy a great deal more food than they manage to eat before it is gone off. Such eating habits have a serious impact on the environment, so the topic is still hotly debated.

To start with, individuals' eating habits have changed greatly over time. People prefer to buy much more food staples than they can consume for several reasons. Firstly, social media makes them purchase trendy food, for instance, Dubai chocolate, although individuals would not buy it without any media pressure. Secondly, modern people feel like buying things in advance, having terrible experience during the pandemic period, when shops ran out of blackwheat and other food staples. People opt for piling up products, despite the fact ^{that} they have an expire date.

However, wasting food causes ecological issues and pollutes the environment. To solve these problems, people should take rapid measures. For example, ~~we~~ make a list of goods they need to buy or share fast-spoiling products with friends and relatives.

In conclusion, I would like to say that reducing food waste has been of great importance recently, as it harms the environment and, therefore,
