ВАРИАНТ № 1

The food problem

The world hunger has been a major problem over the course of our history. Even though this issue has been solved in the recent years among the most prosperous parts of the world, a big number of people still struggle to make ends meet in terms of nutrition.

How come this issue still exists? To begin with, countries do not develop equally, leading to a rift between North and South, as well as West and East. Furthermore, differences in climate can lead to famine and cataclysms, leaving people homeless and starved to death. Also I'd like to mention problematic logistics between countries that suffer from wars, sanctions and regulations. To add on it, rich countries always receive a surplus food that later gets disposed and never reaches those in need.

Is there any solutions? Absolutely! Firstly, we must embrace worldwide organizations to keep an eye on the underdeveloped world as well as monitor Earth's local cataclysms. However, some of these organizations often practice scare mongering tactics, which might not be our cup of tea. To cope with it, we need to control their demand and avoid corruption. Secondly, we must deal with skyrocketing waste of food waste. Finally, it is crucial to give that excess food to starving people.

In conclusion, this issue is fixable and we ought to take action.
