ВАРИАНТ № 1

It is no secret that in many parts of the world, there is not enough food for every citizen. There are several reasons, which can explain, why this happens. Firstly, yet economically undeveloped countries often struggle from overpopulation, which makes it hard to get enough food for everyone. Secondly, ~~some~~ country's geographical location might make food production challenging. For instance, regions, that struggle from continuous drought, can not grow vegetables and fruits. Moreover, import of dairy products can be quite expensive. So complex are the aforementioned facts that many countries still have the problem of spreaded hunger, marginalism or life under the poverty line.

To my mind, even though this problem can be considered unbearable, I believe that a life without hunger is ~~unbearable~~ comprehensible. To solve it simply "^{producing} ~~growing~~ more food" will not help. First of all, government should solve overpopulation problem by correcting its demography. Also, it is crucial to improve the economy and raise the overall life convenience at the same time. Right now many poor families have a lot of children, who are often used as another income source. Therefore, the better ~~and~~ the economy in the country, the less its population grows - the easier it is to regulate the hunger problem.
