Inequality of ~~supplying~~^{supplying} food resources around the world definitely has become an extremely serious problem for the humanity. We can notice the contrast, which drastically and radically influences on people's lives: in modern and progressive countries such as the USA, Japan, and France it is believed that ^{the} societies have even more food than they actually need. By contrast, in developing countries like Africa or India we may see the lack of simple ~~to~~ daily products that have important nutrients and that ^{are} need to be involved in people's meals. However, what are the main reasons of this problem and ~~how can~~ what can we do in order to solve it?

Firstly, I guess it is worth mentioning that natural conditions don't have a big effect on the problem of an amount of food resources in different countries. Some countries that don't demonstrate constant and notable technological progress and don't have high positions in the international competition, a strong leadership often have more natural resources than progressive countries with ~~progressive~~ confident governments. So, secondly, we may outline the main reason of this difficult case - the lack of government's awareness and interest towards the food politics in a certain country. The main goal for many governmental organisations is to receive as much profit as possible, although it may have an unpleasant effect on the residents. For obtaining income, governments can sell many products for other countries. As a result, it can lead to the lack of food. Sure, there are other reasons too: nowadays many people are not enough aware of their behaviour towards the nature, they don't feel responsibility for actions influencing natural habitats. Therefore, some people think that they could do whatever they want, which lead to the worsen of natural and climate conditions.

Now it is time to think about the solutions. Well, I suppose it is vital to improve ecological and marketing legal legislation that will correct food supplying worldwide. But we need to remember that the situation depends on the actions of every person in the world: everyone needs to try ~~not~~ to participate in ^{local} charity and volunteering clubs and it will save lives of millions of people one day.

In conclusion, I believe that this problem is worth solving as it worsen people's lives and there are ~~no~~ some ways of doing that.
