ВАРИАНТ № 1

The lack of food for everyone has been a known problem for a long time. While some parts of the world suffer from food overuse and waste, other lack in the amount of products that would be enough for people living there.

These problems can be caused by the fact that countries with greater economy can afford to supply their people with more than enough products, whereas countries with worse economical situation can't afford such thing. Moreover the first group of countries buys so much products that it later suffers from not using all of them, therefore wasting it.

However, in my opinion, there is one quite logical solution for these problems. Countries that suffer from food waste should analyse the amount of products actually used by people, donating the rest of ~~$~~ already bought ones to the countries in need. Doing so would be highly beneficial for both groups of ~~country~~ countries as it would be able to help solving food-related problems of all of them.

In conclusion, countries from all over the world should ~~not~~ be working together on creating a solution for these problems, as it usually said 'team work makes a dream work'.
