Undoubtedly, food shortages are not uncommon throughout the world these days. Moreover, world hunger is one of the most important global issues ~~and~~ ^{that} have been haunting the world for centuries.

There are multiple reasons for food being scarce in various places. Firstly, natural disasters, such as drought, hurricanes and flash floods can destroy the crops, leading to massive hunger. Secondly, due to uneven distribution of wealth, some people often have no money for food as governments can't support those who live in poverty. Thirdly, wars lead to a decrease in food production and cause transporting issues that result in food shortages.

Personally, I believe that there is no universal way to solve the world hunger. However, there are a few particular ways to make it less common. First of all, many food that goes to waste in the ~~rest~~ European and American countries can be sent to the poor countries or redistributed among the poor in the same country. Secondly, food should be ^{collectively} sent to help the regions suffering from wars and natural disasters. Thus, the humanity will be able to provide all the people with proper nutrition.

In conclusion, I would like to say that even though there is no simple solution to the global issues, such as world hunger, the humanity should work together on doing away with them.
