It's a common scene on public transport. A parent holds a mobile phone showing noisy cartoons to their young child. The pair is looking at the screen together, laughing. Yet parent and child rarely exchange a gaze a) _____.

While many parents can relate to such moments, this is just an example of how technology (mainly digital screens but also vocal assistants, domestic robots and so on) have become part and parcel of our daily routines, changing the way we interact b) _____ with the world around and – most importantly – with each other.

Human development is essentially a social practice. We participate in the world around us and learn from experience, especially from unfamiliar situations c) _____, with the help of more knowledgeable partners.

Международная олимпиада школьников

As adults interact with kids, they share views and create new knowledge. Children learn from it, and adults learn how to see the world from the child's eyes. How can we possibly encounter the world or make sense of it when our attention is captured by a screen?

In the first months and years of life, infants experience and learn the patterns of interaction with others, in which the timings of gaze, movements, vocalisations and language are crucial.

This includes how long you look at each other, or learn to make pauses d) _____ in a conversation or activity. It's also about making eye contact before pointing to an interesting object in the room. These patterns teach us how to relate to others e) _____, and there is currently no substitute for such learning.

And this is our suggestion: any moment of the day spent together without screens is precious, even the ones which seem irrelevant. Reading a book at bedtime, telling invented stories while driving the car, picking up chestnuts on the street on the way home or even being bored together are all crucial.

Keep those moments and choose which ones may just be worth screens, for example when the adult's energy is simply too low to offer anything better. Just find what works for your own family.

- 1) or watch out
- 2) and take turns
- 3) or look out across the landscape
- 4) and perfect timing
- 5) and engage
- 6) and cultural encounters
- 7) and participate in joint activities
